

Free mover

What exactly is a free mover student?

A free mover student is someone who independently organizes their study abroad.

Unlike traditional exchange students, free movers take the initiative to enroll in foreign institutions, navigating the application, admission, and enrollment processes by themselves.

This approach offers unequalled flexibility and a unique opportunity for personal and academic growth.

A free mover student can be described by several terms, each rooted in specific geographical areas:

Free mover student

Study abroad student

Visiting student

Guest student

The term free mover student is used in Europe, and it is valued for its clarity and specificity, designating a student who independently manages their study abroad experience.

Study abroad student, or study abroad semester student, is a prevalent term in the Anglosphere, including the United States, Canada, Australia, and the United Kingdom.

The definition visiting student is broadly used in North America, parts of Europe, and Australia. This definition encompasses all students temporarily studying at a different institution.

The term guest student is used in the Anglosphere, in parts of Europe, and in other select regions.
